Jewish immigrants escaping persecution in Europe frequently settled in urban neighborhoods alongside African Americans, fostering environments where cultural exchange and mutual support could flourish despite prevailing social barriers.

Shared Experiences of Oppression

Both Black and Jewish communities have historically endured marginalization, which laid the groundwork for empathy and alliance. Anti-Black racism and anti-Semitism manifested in legal restrictions, social exclusion, and economic hardship. This shared history of suffering contributed to a common understanding of injustice and fueled collaborative efforts for equality.

Early Alliances and Community Interactions

In many American cities, Black and Jewish communities engaged in cooperative ventures ranging from business partnerships to mutual aid societies.
