Understanding the Voting: Will You Do It? Game

The "Voting: Will You Do It?" game by iCivics is designed to engage students in the electoral process by simulating voting scenarios and decisions. It aims to inform players about the reasons people vote or abstain, the mechanics of elections, and the impact of voting on governance. The game presents realistic situations where users must make choices based on civic knowledge and personal responsibility. This interactive approach helps learners internalize the value of voting and understand the democratic system more thoroughly.

Purpose and Design of the Game

The game's primary goal is to motivate students to participate actively in democracy by educating them on voting's significance. It uses scenarios that reflect common challenges and questions voters face, such as understanding candidates' positions, recognizing the importance of local elections, and overcoming barriers to voting. The design encourages critical thinking and decision-making, making the learning process both engaging and informative.

Target Audience and Educational Outcomes

Targeted primarily at middle and high school students, the game aligns with educational standards for civics and social studies. It supports teachers by providing a practical tool to demonstrate abstract concepts like electoral participation and civic duty. The expected outcome is increased voter awareness, improved knowledge of election processes, and a greater sense of responsibility toward civic engagement among youth.
